Here was a picture to stimulate the intelligence, the imagination and the ambition of a young officer. The precepts of Bourcet and the historical examples which he gives of their application constitute together a full initiation into the art of war as it was known to the best minds of the eighteenth century. They may be regarded as its classical exposition. An officer imbued with this body of doctrine would have the best intellectual outfit for the conduct of a war and for the direction of an army with which the eighteenth century could supply him. The experience of Broglie showed that the intellectual qualification of the general would not suffice for success. It required to be supplemented by a disciplined army and by a determined Government. Thus by the 1st August, 1791, when the tactical discussions in the French army had crystallized into definite regulations for the drill and instruction of the infantry, all the conditions existed for the intellectual training of the new general for whom Guibert was looking. There was a classical theory of war, there was a new spirit consciously striving to raise generalship to a higher power. The infantry had discovered the forms of evolution best suited for the weapon with which it was armed, for flexibility and mobility of manoeuvre. The cavalry officers had reached a true and clear conception of the mission of their arm. The artillery, along with its new guns, had acquired a new view of...
