Forgotten Books, United States, 2015. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from English Poetry in Its Relation to Painting and the Other Arts, Vol. 8 I have no intention of attempting any long disquisition on the relation of the arts to one another, and in particular on the relation of poetry to the other arts. Were we theorizing in the abstract, we might perhaps relate poetry most closely to music. But actually we shall have very much more to say of the relations between poetry and painting. Music and poetry are very near in their origin. Both alike find expression through the rhythms of sound. But as mature arts they have far less in common. Music, like Architecture, is independent of representation or the imitation of Nature. But neither poetry nor painting is in this condition. In either art it is possible to attenuate the matter so that almost nothing but the rhythmic element is left; to make a poem that relies almost entirely on sound, or a painting that relies almost entirely on arabesque. But the poet or painter attempts these things at his peril. Poetry and painting (sculpture also within its more limited range) are in a parallel condition so far as the relation of matter to form is concerned. Alike in painting and poetry, the rhythmic element, stronger perhaps and more explicit in poetry, evokes an emotional mood. We are wrought to a heightened pitch of sensibility; and in this state the subject-matter of painter or poet comes to us with a glow and force such as our senses never experience in the daily traffic of existence. In a perfect example of either art this subject-matter is fused with the form, so that we cannot dissolve them from...
