Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: .There are several institutions working in the training camps for soldiers and sailors, whose work of making the life of the men more comfortable has been so closely related to the regular training that they have come to be considered almost a part of the military education. Among these institutions is the American Library Association. This association maintains a branch library at Great Lakes Naval Training Station and although it has been open but a short time, it has become one of the popular institutions of the station. Here the men go to read when they are off duty, finding on the shelves, which contain more than 11,000 books, reading matter of whatever description they desire. Fiction--there are books of this class a-plenty. They are of the popular and standard variety and are the kind of books that red-blooded young men like to read. Technical books are also at the disposal of the boys. These books are selected with the intention of affording the men the studies that are particularly adapted to the navy man's use. All of the late novels are there, also books of history and those concerning the Great World War since 1914. There are books of travel and of adventure; books that are humorous and books that are sad; books with handsome heroes and beautiful heroines. For those who wish to spend their spare time in reading books that will benefit them in their work of training there are books...
