Excerpt from A Statement of the Faculty s Reasons for Its Proposals Relating to the Reduction of the College Course The proposed requirements for the degree are obviously much more elastic than the present requirements. The number of courses is indeed fixed at sixteen; but the term of residence may be three years, three years and a half, or four years. How would these combined changes affect that considerable proportion of students who because of defective preparation, slender parts, undeveloped tastes, or unawakened ambition might be expected not to avail themselves of the option to take the degree in less time than four years? The experience of the Faculty under the present system justifies the confident expectation that the great body of these students would make a faithful and profitable use of all their years spent as undergraduates. Most of those who needed four years to obtain the degree would take more than the required sixteen courses, following the present common practice of taking extra courses. Others would confine themselves to the required number, but would select, in one or both of the last two years, advanced courses to which their whole time could be advantageously given; and the work of such students would often be better distributed than it is now. As to that small proportion of undergraduates on whom pressure must be brought to prevent idleness, there is nothing in the proposed measures to preclude the maintenance of the present requirement that every student, unless good reasons for exceptional treatment are shown, must take at least four courses in each year of his residence. The majority supposed that the Faculty would in no case depart from the principle, emphasized...
