Forgotten Books, United States, 2015. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from A Children s Code of Morals: For the Girls and Boys There are three ways in which instruction in morals may be presented: as ideas, as habits, and as purposes. A teacher may talk, and the children may learn, about what is and is not moral behavior precisely as they may hear and learn about the length of the Mississippi River. Usually such instruction has little effect upon behavior. Abstract ideas have no motive power and it is quite possible for a child to be able to recite glibly about honesty without the knowledge affecting his daily living in the slightest. On the contrary, it often happens that moral instruction operates to make the children immune to the real moral influences when they arise. It is for this reason that morals as a course of study is not found in the curriculum. No teacher should teach morals explicitly as subject matter nor use this code as something to be learned by the children. The second method of presenting moral instruction to children is by means of habit formation. The child who is required by a courteous teacher to behave always in a courteous manner is sure to acquire the habit of courtesy in school. Unfortunately, however, a mere habit is likely to be narrow and specific. There is nothing to prevent the child who under compulsion acquires the habit of behaving courteously in the classroom from having also the habit of behaving very discourteously upon the playground or in his home. Moreover, the habits which can be built up in classroom situations are few in number. Nevertheless insistence upon correct behavior during schools hours and the gradual formation of...
