Excerpt from The Black and Gold, Vol. 4: November, 1913 I sion, it began to look as if it were going to rain. The storm burst in full blast as we reached the stables. Jim said that we would have to drive in the shelter. He turned the horses toward the stables and I closed my eyes for fear I d see a ghost somewhere around the old place. We drove the horses under the shed of the barn, as this was not so likely to fall down. Night came on and still the ram came down in torrents. We were wet and cold; so I proposed going to the house and making a fire. We decided that it would be just as well to see a few ghosts as to freeze to death. Then, too, we had a desire to explore the old house, which everybody was afraid to go near. We wrapped ourselves in two blankets, which we had brought as beds, and set out for the house, taking some boards, which we found in the stable and our lantern.
